

Jim Horton

I have had a number of careers during my working life. All except the first, as an Army Infantry Officer revolved around finance and sales.

Upon completion my service obligation, I returned to school, obtained an MBA and joined one of the “Big Eight (now Big Four) public accounting firms on their audit staff. It did not take long to realize I did not want to spend my life auditing other firms accounting records. I left and joined an industrial supply company headquartered in Seattle as their Controller. The firm grew and prospered. I had a number of positions over the years, the final one as the company’s General Manager. I was offered the opportunity to become Chief Financial Officer of a venture funded start up. I took the opportunity. My final career was as the owner of my own company which I operated for over six years before selling it and retiring.

I have had prior board experience on both non profit and for profit boards.

I purchased our Treasure Island beach house in 2010. We have enjoyed it ever since.
